Of his chief works, the 'Speculum Meditantis' is a poem written in French, which was discovered by Mr. G. C. Macaulay, and published in his edition of Gower. The 'Vox Clamantis' (in Latin elegiacs), dedicated to Archbishop Arundel, contains an account of the peasants' revolt of 1381, and an indictment of government and society under Richard II. Attached to it in Coxe's collation is Gower's 'Chronica Tripartita', a Latin poem dealing with events as far as the abdication of Richard II, in which the victims of his coup d'état are eulogised (the whole first printed by the Roxburghe Club, ed. H. O. Coxe, 1860). The 'Confessio Amantis' (Gower's only English poem), extant in two versions, the first dedicated to Richard II, the second to Henry IV, contains many stories drawn from Ovid and later sources, with learned digressions, and is preceded by a prologue. Caxton's edition (1483) follows the second version, as does Berthelet's (1532), the latter being the basis of Pauli's text (1857), reprinted by Professor H. Morley (1888). Extracts from a manuscript volume of other poems presented by Gower to Henry IV were printed, 1818. [xxii. 299]

Academy of Music, 1720-8, composing thirteen operas, besides collaborating in 'Muzio Scevola' with Buononcini, thenceforth his rival in popular favour; naturalised, 1726; appointed court composer; produced coronation anthems on the accession of George II, 1727; carried on (1729-35) a second operatic undertaking at the King's Theatre, Covent Garden, producing several new operas, and giving performances of 'Esther' and 'Acis and Galatea', 1732, and 'Deborah', 1733; 'Athaliah' first heard at Oxford, 1733; ousted from the King's Theatre by his rivals, 1735; gave more operas, and repeated his oratorios in Lent at Rich's new theatre, Covent Garden, 1735-7, when he became bankrupt and partially paralysed; composed a fine anthem for the funeral of Queen Caroline, 1737, and two new operas, 1738, when his debts were paid by a benefit concert; his statue by Roubiliac set up at Vauxhall, 1738; his last operas given at Lincoln's Inn Fields, 1740-1, also setting of Dryden's shorter 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day', 1739; the first annual performance of 'Alexander's Feast' for the Society of Musicians, with himself at the organ, given 1739; his 'Saul' and 'Israel in Egypt', produced at the King's Theatre, 1739; his oratorio the 'Messiah' (composed in twenty-three days) first heard at Dublin, 1741, in London, 1743 (Covent Garden), and in Germany (Hamburg), 1772; his 'Samson' given at a subscription concert at Covent Garden, and the Dettingen 'Te Deum' at St. James's Palace, 1743; 'Joseph and his Brethren' and 'Semele', 1744 (Covent Garden); 'Hercules' and 'Belshazzar' (King's Theatre), 1744-5; 'Judas Maccabeus', 1747; 'Alexander Balus' and 'Joshua', 1748 (Covent Garden); his oratorios 'Susanna' and 'Solomon', produced, 1749; his 'Music for the Fireworks' performed at Vauxhall and the Green Park to celebrate the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 1749; his 'Theodora', 1760, a failure; conducted a performance of the 'Messiah' (with the organ presented by himself) at the Foundling Hospital, 1760; his last oratorio, 'Jephthah', produced at Covent Garden, 1763; his last composition, 'The Triumph of Time and Truth', 1767; buried in Westminster Abbey. His manuscript scores passed from John Christopher Smith to George III. He carried choral music to its highest point, but in instrumental did not advance beyond his contemporaries. His almost certain appropriation (notably in 'Israel in Egypt') of the work of others is in strong contradiction with his known character. A collection of his works, begun in Germany, 1856, with the help of the king of Hanover, was continued under the auspices of the Prussian government. Roubiliac executed his monument in Westminster Abbey and three busts. [xxiv. 277]

HENRY II (1133-1189), king of England; grandson of Henry I, and son of Geoffrey of Anjou and Matilda (1102-1187) [q. v.]; inherited Angevin territories, 1151; obtained Aquitaine by marriage with Eleanor (1122?-1204) [q. v.], 1152; came to terms with Stephen, 1153; succeeded to crown, 1154; issued charter based on that of Henry I; expelled Flemish mercenaries and reduced rebellious barons, 1155; exacted homage and restoration of border counties from Malcolm of Scotland; acquired county of Nantes and recognition of overlordship of Brittany, 1158; re-established exchequer in England; developed curia regis; issued new coinage, 1158; extended in a 'great assize' the system of inquest by sworn recognitors to settlement of land disputes; broke down by the 'great scutage' military dependence of crown on feudal tenants, 1159; gained possession of the Vexin by French marriage of eldest surviving son Henry, 1160; helped Pope Alexander III against the emperor, 1162; made Thomas Becket [q. v.] archbishop, 1162, but was resisted by him, especially in his attempt to bring the clergy within civil jurisdiction, through the constitutions of Clarendon, 1164; caused Becket's condemnation at Northampton, 1164; on his flight enforced the constitutions; applied the principle of jury inquest to criminal matters by the assize of Clarendon, 1166, the first attempt in England to issue a new code of laws, and to break down feudalism by subordinating independent jurisdictions to a central court; allied himself, through his daughters' marriages, with the emperor Frederick Barbarossa and the kings of Castile, 1168-9, and Sicily, 1169; defeated the Bretons, 1166-9; by treaty of Montmirail (1169) obtained sanction of France to establishment of his sons Henry, Geoffrey, and Richard; had Prince Henry crowned by the archbishop of York, 1170; suspended, and, after inquiry into their conduct, replaced by exchequer officials most of the sheriffs, 1170; made formal peace with Becket and his ally, Louis of France; after Becket's murder (1170) purged himself and abjured the 'customs,' which had been the chief cause of quarrel; by an expedition to Ireland (1171-1172) received the submission both of Normans in Ireland and natives, divided the land into fiefs, and left Hugh de Lacy as royal vicegerent; drove Louis from Normandy, 1173; crushed Breton revolt, 1173, and (after doing penance at Canterbury) the baronial rising in England; exacted homage from his prisoner, William, king of Scots; checked by these successes combination headed by the young King Henry (crowned heir) and his mother (1173-4); issued assize of Northampton, 1176, including among its clauses the 'assize of mort d'ancestor' and a provision requiring an oath of fealty from all Englishmen; obtained partial recognition of his constitutions from the pope; ordered a return of all crown tenements, 1177; constituted inner tribunal for higher work of curia regis, 1178; established judicial circuits, 1178-80; issued assize of arms, 1181, making defensive service obligatory, and personal property subject to taxation; received homage from king of Connaught, 1175; arbiter between Arragon and Toulouse

1178, and Castile and Navarre, 1177; mediator in France, 1180-2; was asked to deliver the Holy Land, 1185, but was engaged in war with his sons Henry and Geoffrey on behalf of Richard, 1183, and afterwards with Richard and Philip Augustus of France, to whose claims he was reduced (1189) to submit at Colomblères; died at Chinon; buried at Fontevraud, where is his tomb and effigy. He was a lover of learning and a great builder; his works of this kind including many palaces, the embankment of the Loire, and the Grand Pont at Angers. [xxvi. 1]

HENRY III (1207-1272), king of England; grandson of Henry II and son of John; crowned at Gloucester, 1216, and did homage to Gualo, the Pope's legate; accompanied William Marshall [q. v.], the regent, to siege of London and to negotiate peace with Louis of France and his supporters, 1217; received homage from Alexander II of Scotland; crowned again at Westminster, 1220, by direction of the pope; marched with the legate and the Earl of Chester to force William of Aumale to give up Biham Castle, 1221; agreed to confirm the Great Charter, 1223; compelled the Welsh to make peace; took Fulk de Breauté's castle at Bedford, 1224; declared himself of full age, 1227, having during his minority had a 'continual' council distinct from the court; lost most of his French possessions, 1224, but recovered Gascony, 1225; negotiated with Brittany, the emperor, and Bavaria; compelled by barons to restore the forest liberties; defeated by Welsh, 1228; secretly agreed to pope's demand for a tenth of all property, 1229; invaded Poitou and Gascony, 1230; obtained scutage in exchange for affirmation of liberties of church, 1231; refused aid for Welsh war; dismissed Hubert de Burgh [q. v.] and made Segrave justiciar, 1232; replaced English officers by Poitevin friends of Bishop Peter des Roches; compelled after a contest by Richard Marshall and Archbishop Edmund Rich [q. v.] to dismiss Poitevins and to be reconciled with De Burgh and the barons, 1234; thenceforth (1234) became his own minister; married his sister Isabella to the Emperor Frederic II, 1235; wedded Eleanor of Provence, 1236, in which year was passed the assize of Merton; depended on guidance of his wife's uncle, William de Valence, and Provençal favourites; invited the legate Otto to England; favoured Simon de Montfort (husband of his sister Eleanor), but quarrelled with him, 1239; opposed by Richard, Earl of Cornwall [q. v.] and citizens of London; made concessions; entertained Baldwin II, emperor of the East, 1238; his life attempted by a crazy clerk, 1238; kept see of Winchester vacant, the monks refusing (1238) to elect William of Valence; founded Netley Abbey, 1239; gave the archbishopric of Canterbury to Boniface of Savoy [q. v.], 1241, and see of Hereford to another foreigner; allowed the pope to take a fifth of the clergy's goods and many benefices, c. 1240; made Peter of Savoy Earl of Richmond; joined the Count of La Marche and others in an expedition to Gascony, 1242, but was deserted by him and forced by Louis IX to retreat, 1243; brought back more foreigners, detaching his brother Richard from the opposition by marrying him to Sanchia of Provence; compelled by Innocent IV to recall the banished bishop of Winchester; obliged, in order to get a scutage, to admit four 'guardians of liberties' to his council; made other concessions to the baronage; with money furnished by Richard of Cornwall undertook successful Welsh campaign, 1245; joined in remonstrance against the pope's exactions, but gave way, and laid a heavy tallage on London, 1246; enriched his foreign half-brothers from church revenues; refused an aid, 1249; exacted more money from Londoners and Jews; received homage for Lothian from Alexander III of Scotland on his marriage, 1261; appointed Simon de Montfort governor of Gascony; insulted de Montfort with accusations, 1262; was refused money for a crusade, 1262; confirmed the charters in return for money, 1263, and made a second expedition into Gascony; visited Pontigny, Fontevraud, and Paris; agreed to bear cost of Pope Alexander II's war with Manfred in return for grant of Sicilian crown to his son Edmund; unable to obtain regular grants; demanded from parliament at Westminster (1258) a third of all property, the barons attending in armour and led by Roger Bigod, fourth Earl of Norfolk [q. v.]; met barons in 'Mad Parliament' at Oxford (1258), which drew up 'Provisions,' giving barons control of the executive and the nomination of half the council, a committee of twenty-four being appointed to carry out reforms; made peace with France by giving up Normandy and his hereditary possessions; on his return from France to England brought accusation against

Simon de Montfort, 1260; dismissed the barons' justiciar, 1261; seized Dover Castle, 1261; exhibited papal bull absolving him from keeping the provisions, 1261; ordered the knights of the shire to attend him at Windsor instead of the barons at St. Albans, 1261; decision given in his favour by Louis IX of France in the 'Mise of Amiens,' to whom the provisions had been referred for arbitration, 1264, the award being upheld by Pope Urban IV; captured the younger de Montfort at Northampton, April 1264, the barons having refused to accept the award, and allied themselves with the Welsh; took Leicester, Nottingham, and Tounbridge; compelled to march into Sussex for provisions; routed at Lewes, 14 May, 1264; compelled to summon a parliament (including four knights from each shire) and to forbid his queen to raise money for him, 1264; gave his assent to the constitution drawn up in the famous parliament of 1265; restored to power by his son Prince Edward's victory at Evesham, 1265, when he was wounded, being at the time detained in Montfort's army; revoked all his recent acts, declared the rebels' lands forfeited, fined the Londoners, reduced Kenilworth, and came to terms with Gloucester in London and Llywelyn in Wales; at the Marlborough parliament (1267) granted many reforms, but retained the executive; assented to statute forbidding the Jews to acquire debtors' land, 1269; completed (1269) and opened Westminster Abbey, the body of Edward the Confessor being translated; buried in Westminster Abbey before the high altar, his heart being sent to Fontevraud. Most of the troubles of his reign were due to his foreign sympathies. [xxvi. 12]

HENRY IV (1367-1413), king of England; son of John of Gaunt [q. v.]; sometimes called Henry of Bolingbroke from his birthplace; styled Earl of Derby in early life; K.G., 1377; married Mary de Bohun, coheiress of Hereford, 1380; praised by Froissart; as one of the five lords appellant opposed Robert de Vere [q. v.], who, marching on London, compelled Richard II to grant their demands, 1387; took part in proceedings of 'Merciless parliament,' 1388, but gradually regained Richard's favour; joined 'crusade' of the Teutonic knights against Lithuania, 1390; went on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, 1392-1393, being entertained by the kings of Bohemia and Hungary, the Archduke of Austria, and the Venetians; one of the council during Richard's absence in Ireland, 1395; took a decided part for the king against his former allies, and was created Duke of Hereford, 1397; appealed Norfolk of treason, but was not allowed to fight with him, being banished the realm for ten years, 1398; exiled for life, his Lancaster estates also being confiscated during his stay at Paris; with the two Arundels and others, secretly left France and landed near Bridlington, 1399; joined by northern nobles; held council at Doncaster, and with a large army marched to Bristol, where some of the royal officers were executed, July 1399; met King Richard, who had been deserted by his army, at Flint; was promised restoration of his estates; took the king to London, where Richard resigned the crown, 29 Sept. 1399; obtained the throne by popular election; founded the order of the Bath before his coronation, 1399; condemned Richard, who soon died, possibly starved, to perpetual imprisonment, 1399; crushed rising of Richard's dispossessed supporters, 1400; made expeditions against the Scots (1400) and Welsh (1400 and 1401) and entertained the Greek emperor, Manuel Palaiologos, 1400; married as his second wife Joan, regent of Brittany, 1402; was attacked by the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy in France and by Franciscan conspirators in England, 1402; failed to subdue the Welsh, 1402; defeated the discontented Percies at Shrewsbury, 1403; received submission of Northumberland, 1403; compelled to agree to expulsion of aliens; was strengthened by defeat of French at Dartmouth, 1404; received liberal supplies from 'Unclearned parliament' at Coventry, 1404; escaped assassination at Eltham, 1404; suppressed revolt of Northumberland, Archbishop Scrope [q. v.], and the earl marshal, 1405; captured the heir to the Scottish throne, 1405; compelled by parliament to nominate a constitutional council, to submit to an audit of accounts, and reform his household, 1406; barred the Beauforts from the succession, 1407; finally defeated Northumberland and Bardolf at Bramham Moor, 1408; declined in health and energy, but interested himself in Archbishop Arundel's attempt to heal the papal schism; supported the church party in preventing proposed confiscation of their temporalities, but was himself refused a revenue for life, 1410; defeated attempt to force him to abdicate in favour of Prince Henry, broke off Burgundian alliance, and undertook a progress, 1411-12; increased Chaucer's pension and patronised Gower; died in Jerusalem Chamber, Westminster; his tomb at Canterbury opened, 1832. [xxvi. 31]

HENRY V (1387-1422), king of England; eldest son of Henry IV, by Mary de Bohun; born at Monmouth; said to have been educated by his uncle Henry Beaufort (d. 1447) [q. v.] at Queen's College, Oxford; attended Richard II, 1398-9; accompanied his father to Wales, 1400, where he represented him for the next three years, recovering Conway, reducing Merioneth and Carnarvon, and checking Glendower [q. v.]; assisted his father at Shrewsbury, 1403; returned to the Welsh marches and relieved Cwyty Castle, 1406; after joining in petition against lollards, 1406, captured Aberystwith and invaded Scotland, 1407; warden of the Cinque ports and constable of Dover, 1409; probably governed in his father's name during chancellorship of Thomas Beaufort [q. v.], 1410-11; sent an expedition to help Burgundy against the Armagnacs; withdrew from the council, 1412, his French policy being reversed; succeeded to the throne, 1413; the supposed wildness of his youth unsupported by contemporary authority, while his traditional conduct towards Gascoigne (taken by Shakespeare from Hall) is improbable, and is first mentioned in Sir T. Elyot's 'Governour' (1531); appointed Henry Beaufort (d. 1447) [q. v.] chancellor, and the Earl of Arundel treasurer; gave the remains of Richard II honourable burial; had Oldcastle arrested, and lollardy repressed, 1414; demanded the restoration of French territories ceded at Bretigny, together with the Norman and Angevin lands, as a condition of his marriage with Catherine of France; left Portsmouth to make war with France (August 1415), just after a conspiracy to proclaim the Earl of March king had been discovered; took Harfleur and challenged the dauphin to single combat, 1415; sent back Clarence in charge of many sick, and marched with the rest towards Calais; after futile negotiations attacked the greatly superior French army, himself commanding the centre, at Agincourt (25 Oct. 1415), where the French were routed with great slaughter; reached Calais a few days later, crossed the Channel within a fortnight, and after a triumphal entry into London was granted by parliament tonnage and poundage for life, the custom on wool, and other taxes, 1415; while in England restored the heirs of Mortimer, Percy, and Holland to their estates; made an alliance with Sigismund, king of the Romans, which led to the termination of the papal schism, 1416; came to an understanding with Burgundy, October, 1416; laid the foundations of a national navy and of military, international, and maritime law; took Caen, leading the assault in person, 1417; sent lieutenants against Cherbourg, Coutances, Avranches, and Evreux; subduing the greater part of Normandy; surrounded Rouen, cutting it off from the sea with the aid of a Portuguese fleet, and reduced it by famine after a long siege, 1419, while keeping open the feud between Armagnacs and Burgundians by alternate negotiations with each; after a short truce surprised Pontoise, 1419, and on the murder of John, duke of Burgundy, concluded an alliance with the new duke Philip; after more fighting and negotiation, accepted the treaty of Troyes (1420), by which Henry was declared heir of Charles VI, regent of France, and lord of Normandy, the dauphin being excepted from the arrangement; married Catherine of France, 1420; personally directed capture of Melun, November 1420, meeting the Bre de Barbazan in single combat; entered Paris in triumph, December 1420; arranged for the government of Normandy; took his wife to England to be crowned; reformed the Benedictine monasteries; sent back James I to Scotland; returned to France to reassert his sway, 1421; relieved Chartres, 1421; drove the dauphin across the Loire; took Meaux, 1422; while on his way to succour Burgundy at Combe died at Bois de Vincennes. After a funeral procession through France his body was buried in Westminster Abbey, a chantry being endowed in his honour. The silver head of his effigy was stolen from the Confessor's chapel in 1545. He was a patron of the poets Lydgate and Hoccleve. Indefatigable justice, affability, and religious spirit were among his chief characteristics, and he was the first of contemporary generals and an able diplomatist. [xxvi. 43]

during his minority, his uncle, Humphrey of Gloucester, being protector, and Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, his 'master'; appeared in public functions in early childhood; crowned at Westminster, 1429, and at Paris, 1430; opened parliament in person, 1432; mediated at a great council between Gloucester and Bedford, 1434; his precocious interest in politics restrained by the council; admitted to share in government, 1437, but warned that he was exercising it unprofitably; identified himself with Cardinal Beaufort's peace policy; greatly interested in scheme for his marriage with a daughter of the Comte d'Armagnac, 1441-3; attained legal majority, 1442; concluded two years' truce with France, 1443; married Margaret of Anjou, daughter of the Duke of Lorraine, 1445; under influence of Beaufort and Suffolk, ordered Gloucester's arrest, 1447; surrendered Maine for prolongation of truce with France, 1448; made constant progresses through England; secretly supported Suffolk, but was obliged to exile him, 1450; attempted to suppress Cade's rising, but fled to Kenilworth, leaving the work to Archbishop Kemp and Waynflete, 1450; lost Normandy; obliged to make Richard, duke of York [q. v.], a councillor, and agree to arrest of Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset [q. v.]; made Somerset captain of Calais, and refused to remove him from court, 1451; lost Guenne, 1451; deeply in debt; attempted a general pacification and pardon, 1452; won back part of Guenne, 1452, but lost it all, 1453; temporarily lost his reason, 1453; on his recovery released Somerset and exiled York from the council, 1455; slightly wounded at first battle of St. Albans, 1455; again became ill; persuaded on recovery to remove York from office, 1456, but allowed him to remain in the council, and with the help of Buckingham maintained peace for two years; after Salisbury's victory (1459) at Bloreheath marched against Ludlow and drove York and the Nevilles from England, 1459, afterwards attaining them at Coventry; was defeated and captured by Warwick at Northampton, and compelled to acknowledge York as heir to the crown, 1460; in spite of the defeat of the Yorkists by his queen (Margaret) at Wakefield (1460) and St. Albans (1461). Henry fled northward after Edward, duke of York, was proclaimed king, 1461; at York while Towton Field was fought unsuccessfully by his friends, 1461; attained by the Yorkists, 1461; took refuge with the Scots, 1461; granted charter to Edinburgh, 1464; narrowly escaped capture at Hexham, 1464; lurked disguised for a year on the Lancashire and Yorkshire border; was captured and imprisoned in the Tower for five years (1465-70); restored by Warwick, 1470; presided at a parliament, but (1471) fell into the hands of Edward IV, and was taken by him to Barnet; after battle of Barnet (1471) was re-committed to the Tower; murdered on the night of Edward's return, Richard of Gloucester being held responsible; worshipped as a martyr by both countrymen; his canonisation proposed by Henry VII. Henry VI was too weak to rule men, but was genuinely pious, and a liberal patron of learning. Besides taking great interest in the universities of Oxford and Caen, he founded Eton (1440) and King's College, Cambridge (1441), and suggested to his queen Margaret the foundation of Queens' College, Cambridge, 1448. [xxvi. 56]

HENRY VII (1457-1509), king of England; son of Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, and Margaret Beaufort [q. v.], heiress of John of Gaunt; brought up in Wales by his uncle, Jasper Tudor; captured at Harlech by the Yorkist Herbert, 1468, but reclaimed by his uncle and presented to Henry VI, 1470; head of house of Lancaster on Henry VI's death, 1471; refugee in Brittany during reign of Edward IV; prevented by a storm from joining Buckingham's rebellion against Richard III, 1483; at council of refugees held at Rennes promised to marry Elizabeth of York on obtaining the English crown; after warning by Morton of contemplated betrayal to Richard, escaped from Brittany to France; with Oxford and some French troops landed at Milford Haven, 1485; joined by Welshmen and others; with the help of Sir William Stanley (d. 1495) [q. v.] defeated and slew Richard at Bosworth, 1485; crowned, 1485; created peers and instituted a bodyguard; married Princess Elizabeth, 1486; defeated the conspirator Simnel at Stoke-on-Trent, 1487; failed to mediate between France and Brittany, 1488; employed Surrey to suppress discontent in the north, 1489; in alliance with Maximilian, king of the Romans, and Ferdinand and Isabella, besieged Boulogne (1492), but concluded the treaty of Etaples with Charles VIII, 1492; took prompt action against Yorkists, and delayed for three years the invasion of England by Perkin Warbeck [q. v.]; drove Warbeck from Ireland by the action of Sir Edward Poynings [q. v.], 1494, and through Spanish diplomacy procured Warbeck's dismissal from the Scottish court; lenient in suppressing Cornish insurrection, 1497; executed Warwick and Warbeck after their attempted escape from the Tower, 1499; concluded treaties with Scotland, 1499, Burgundy, 1500, and the Emperor Maximilian, 1502; lost his queen, 1503; arranged marriages of his children with Spain and Scotland; entertained Philip and Joanna of Castile, and made commercial treaty with Flanders, 1506; died at Richmond in the palace named and built by himself. Through his agents Empson and Dudley he practised much extortion. He was considered one of the wisest princes of his time, and was a great promoter of commerce and learning. He built the chapel in Westminster Abbey called by his name. [xxvi. 69]

HENRY VIII (1491-1547), king of England; second son of Henry VII.; nominal lieutenant of Ireland, 1494; created Prince of Wales, 1503, on the death of his elder brother Arthur (1486-1502) [q. v.], to whose widow, Catherine of Aragon [q. v.], he was contracted, but marriage was delayed till his accession, 1509, owing to disputes about her dowry; had Empson and Dudley, the agents of his father's extortions, executed, 1510; helped his father-in-law against the Moors, 1511, and the regent of the Netherlands against Gueldres, 1511, joined the pope, Ferdinand, and Venice, in a league against France, 1511; some important naval victories won by his admirals, the Howards, one of whom captured Andrew Barton [q. v.], 1511; sent an unsuccessful expedition for the recovery of Guienne, 1512; built the Henry Grace de Dieu (largest ship hitherto floated); with the help of the Emperor Maximilian won the battle of Spurs, 1513 (the Scots being defeated at Flodden in his absence); deserted by his allies, made separate peace with France on the basis of a marriage between his sister Mary and Louis XII, 1514; made Cardinal Wolsey chancellor; followed Wolsey's advice in helping Maximilian with money to check the French in Italy, and in keeping on good terms with him, in securing Charles in Castile, and (1518) in making peace with Francis I of France; became, against Wolsey's advice, a secret candidate for the empire, 1519; met Francis at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, 1520, but had previous and subsequent interviews with the Emperor Charles V. also; while pretending to mediate between them called himself with Charles; next year at home had Buckingham executed on a vague charge of treason; his demand for a forced loan, in consequence of the threatened hostilities with France, successfully resisted by London, 1525; helped by Wolsey's negotiations to a secret understanding with France; began negotiations with the pope for a divorce from Catherine of Aragon, 1527; given a commission to hear the case in England, 1528, which met (1529), but was revoked to Rome unfinished, 1529; dismissed Wolsey, October 1529, and took Cranmer as his adviser on the divorce; consulted English, French, and Italian universities, 1530, eight decisions against the validity of marriage with a brother's wife and against the pope's power to dispense being obtained by bribery; wrung from the clergy a qualified acknowledgment of his title as supreme head of the church in exchange for a pardon for having incurred the penalties of prebendary by recognising Wolsey as papal legate, 1531; separated from Catherine on her refusal of arbitration, 1531; secretly married his second wife, Anne Boleyn, and, Cranmer having decided against the validity of the marriage with Catherine, had Anne crowned publicly, 1533; secretly encouraged the Commons to present 'supplication against the ordinaries,' 1532; took away independent powers of convocation; named Cranmer archbishop; provisionally withdrew first-fruits of benefices (annates) and abolished appeals to Rome; was excommunicated, 1533; confirmed abolition of annates; caused Elizabeth Barton [q. v.] to be attainted, 1533; abolished Roman jurisdiction and revenues in England, 1534; obtained act of succession (1534) compelling all subjects to acknowledge Anne Boleyn's issue as heirs to the crown; imprisoned More and Fisher; executed the Nun of Kent and her adherents, 1534; suppressed the observants, and imprisoned recusant friars; obtained severe treason law, parliamentary confirmation of headship of church, and transference of first-fruits and tenths to crown (1534-5); executed Fisher. More, and some Charterhouse monks for refusing to accept the king's headship, 1535; opened negotiations with German protestants; instituted visitations of monasteries and universities by royal officers under Thomas Cromwell (1486?-1540) [q. v.], and appropriated the revenues of the smaller houses, 1535; beheaded Anne Boleyn and married his third wife, Jane Seymour, 1536; had succession act passed in interests of Jane Seymour, 1536; at first temporised with and then crushed rising in the north and east caused by religious changes and heavy taxation, 1536-7; lamented death of Jane Seymour, 1538; resumed dissolution of monasteries, but failed in negotiations with German protestants; maintained old doctrines; procured statute of the Six Articles, 1539; executed last descendants of the Yorkist house; married his fourth wife, Anne of Cleves, January 1540; executed Cromwell and divorced Anne of Cleves, July 1540; at once married his fifth wife, Catherine Howard; had Barnes and other protestants burned for heresy (1538-40); beheaded Queen Catherine Howard, 1542; proclaimed Ireland a kingdom, 1542; revived the feudal claim on Scotland, and defeated James V, 1542; concluded alliance with Emperor Charles V, 1543; married his sixth and last wife, Catherine Parr [q. v.], 1543; debased the currency; sent an army into Scotland, which burned Leith and Edinburgh, 1544; captured Boulogne, 1545; was granted the endowments of many colleges, chantries, and hospitals, 1545; deserted by Charles V; made peace with France, 1546; gained possession of St. Andrews by aiding the conspiracy against Beaton, 1546; authorised many persecutions for heresy; caused the Earl of Surrey to be beheaded and the Duke of Norfolk attainted, 1547. Henry was technically constitutional, but practically absolute, and a consummate statesman. He completed Wolsey's college at Oxford, calling it Henry VIII's College (Christ Church), erected six new bishoprics from monastical endowments, and established suffragans. He wrote 'Assertio Septem Sacramentorum' against Luther (1521) and preface to revised edition ('king's book') of 'Institution of a Christian Man' ('bishops' book'). Many portraits of him by Holbein are extant. [xxvi. 76]

HENRY OF SCOTLAND (1114?-1152), son of David I of Scotland; granted by Stephen the earldoms of Carlisle, Doncaster, and Huntingdon; fought at battle of the Standard, 1138; created Earl of Northumberland, 1139. [xxvi. 94]

HOOD, ROBIN, legendary outlaw; the name, which originally represented a mythical forest-elf, 'Hodeken', is part of the designation of places and plants in every part of England. His historical authenticity is ill-supported. As an historical character Robin Hood appears in Wytoun's 'Chronicle of Scotland' (c. 1420), and is referred to as a ballad hero by Bower, Major, and Stow. The first detailed history, 'Lytell Geste of Robyn Hood' (printed, c. 1495), locates him in south-west Yorkshire; later writers placing him in Sherwood and Plumpton Park (Cumberland), and finally making him Earl of Huntingdon. Plays dealing with his exploits were written by Munday, Chettle, and others (1600-1784). The 'True Tale of Robin Hood' (verse) was issued, 1632; 'Robin Hood's Garland', 1670, and prose narrative, 1678. Major first assigned him to the reign of Richard I. A date (18 Nov. 1247) was given for his death by Martin Parker ('True Tale', c. 1632) and by Thoresby, and his pedigree was supplied by Stukeley. According to Joseph Hunter [q. v.] he was a contemporary of Edward II and adherent of Thomas of Lancaster. [xxvii. 258]

HYDE, EDWARD, first EARL OF CLARENDON (1609-1674), B.A. Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 1626; friend of Falkland, Ben Jonson, Selden, and Waller; barrister, Middle Temple, 1633; keeper of writs and rolls of the common pleas, 1634; as M.P. for Wootton Bassett in Short parliament (1640) attacked jurisdiction of the marshal's court, and practically obtained its abolition; represented Saltash in Long parliament; chairman of committees of investigation into proceedings of councils of the north and of Wales; took prominent part against the judges; helped to prepare impeachment of Strafford; defended episcopacy, 1641; successfully obstructed Root and Branch Bill, 1641; in second session opposed the Grand Remonstrance, and composed the king's reply; with Falkland and Colepeper arranged to manage king's parliamentary affairs; kept ignorant of design to arrest the five members, 1642; joined Charles I at York, 1642, and for three years drew up all his declarations; advised adherence to law and constitutional methods, with refusal of further concessions; thwarted by influence of the queen and Lord Digby; privy councillor and chancellor of the exchequer, 1643; one of the 'junto' of five; raised loans from Oxford university and the catholics; prominent in negotiations, especially at Uxbridge, 1645, refusing real concessions, but endeavouring to win over opposition leaders by personal offers; obtained calling of Oxford parliament as counterpoise to that of Westminster, 1643; leading spirit of Prince Charles's council in the west, 1645; followed him to Scilly and Jersey, 1646, where he began his history; opposed queen's wish for concessions to Scots and plans for using foreign armies; issued reply to Long parliament's declaration of reasons against further addresses to the king, 1648; captured by corsair on way to Paris; ultimately joined the prince at the Hague; advised him against accepting Scottish proposals; accompanied Cottington to obtain help from Spain and negotiate alliance between Ormonde and O'Neill for recovery of Ireland, 1649-50; after Worcester (1651) Charles II's chief adviser, as secretary of state, and (from 1658) lord chancellor; opposed concessions to presbyterians and Romanists and isolated movements in England, but favoured negotiations with levellers; as chancellor and member of secret committee of six became virtual head of the government, 1660; chancellor of Oxford, 1660-7; created Baron Hyde, 1660, and Viscount Cornbury and Earl of Clarendon, 1681; forwarded Act of Indemnity; in church matters favoured comprehension rather than toleration; opposed to severe treatment of nonconformists, but firm in enforcing Act of Uniformity (1662) and subsequent measures; zealous for restoration of episcopacy in Scotland; one of the eight proprietors of Carolina, 1683; tolerant in colonial affairs, but supported navigation laws and measures tending to promote mutual division among the colonies; desired peace policy in foreign affairs, but was forced into war; refused bribe from France, but solicited loan; did not initiate, but carried out, sale of Dunkirk, 1662; deprecated attack on Dutch African possessions, but defended seizure (1664) of New Amsterdam; looked upon as French in his sympathies, though really opposed to French alliance; ill-success of Dutch war partly due to his administrative conservatism; overthrown by court intrigues and hostility of parliament, whose authority he had endeavoured to restrict; dismissed, 1667; subsequently impeached; though the Lords declined to commit him, fled to France, 1667; banished; three years at Avignon and Montpellier; removed to Moulins, 1671, and Rouen, 1674, completing his 'History' and writing autobiography; died at Rouen; buried in Westminster Abbey. A consistent upholder of constitutional monarchy, he refused to recognise the altered conditions introduced by the civil war. He took Tacitus and Hooker as models in his 'History of the Rebellion,' which is very unequal in its historical and literary value, being a blend of his later written 'Life' with an unfinished 'History,' the former supplying the more accurate element. 'The True Historical Narrative of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England' was printed from a transcript under supervision of Clarendon's son, Rochester, 1702-4, the original manuscript being first used in Bandinel's edition (1826); the best text that of W. D. Macray, 1888; profits used to build printing-press at Oxford (Clarendon Buildings). A supplement was issued, 1717. The 'Life of Clarendon,' by himself, was published, 1759, 'History of Rebellion and Civil War in Ireland,' 1720, and selections from his correspondence ('Clarendon State Papers'), edited by Scrope and Monkhouse, 1767-86. [xxviii. 370]

JAMES I (1394-1437), king of Scotland; third son of Robert III; placed under guardianship of Henry Wardlaw at St. Andrews, 1403; captured while on his way to France by an English ship, probably in 1406; detained in England nineteen years and well educated, but confined first in the Tower, afterwards at Nottingham and Evesham, and, on accession of Henry V. at Windsor, accompanying that king to France in 1420; released, 1423, on condition of his paying a ransom, withdrawing Scottish troops from France, and marrying an English wife; married Jane [q. v.], daughter of the Earl of Somerset, 1424; returned to Scotland and was crowned, 1424; twenty-seven acts passed in his first parliament, 1424, by the lords of the articles, including confirmation of the privileges of the church, prohibition of private war, and measures strengthening the royal authority, granting the customs to the king, and appointing officers to administer justice to the Commons (the statute-book dates from this parliament); registration of titles to land, parliamentary attendance of prelates, barons and freeholders, granting of heretics by the secular arm, regulation of weights and measures, and a central judicial court, provided for by parliament of 1425-6. James I had the late regent Albany and his chief adherents tried and executed for misgovernment, 1425; summoned a parliament at Inverness, reducing the highlands to order, 1427; concluded marriage treaty with France, 1428; renewed truce with England, 1429; made commercial treaty with Flanders, 1429; put down heresy, but reformist clerical abuses and resisted the demands of popes Martin V. and Eugenius IV.; defeated the Lord of the Isles, 1429; imported cannon from Flanders, 1430; sent representatives to council of Basle, 1433; sent the Princess Margaret to marry the dauphin, 1436; held a parliament at Edinburgh; was murdered at Perth by Sir Robert Graham and conspirators in his own household; buried in the convent of the Carthusians. In spite of his premature attempt to reform the Scottish constitution on the English model he left the monarchy stronger, and improved Scotland's position in Europe. His poem, 'The Kingis Quair,' composed in England, was discovered and printed by Lord Woodhouselee, 1783; other works have also been attributed to him. He was nominal founder and great benefactor of St. Andrews University. [xxix. 129]

JAMES II (1430-1460), king of Scotland; son of James I [q. v.]; crowned at Holyrood, 1437; removed by queen-mother to Stirling, 1439, but kidnapped and brought back to Edinburgh by Sir William Crichton [q. v.]; regained liberty with help of William Douglas, eighth earl of Douglas [q. v.], and Sir Alexander Livingstone [q. v.], 1443; captured Edinburgh Castle, 1445; married Mary of Gueldres, 1449; had Livingstone and his family tried and executed, 1450; re-enacted in parliament of 1450 statutes of James I; proclaimed a general peace, 1450, and afforded protection to tillers of the soil; stabbed Douglas at Stirling, 1452, and wasted his lands, on discovery of the confederacy of Douglas, Crawford, and Ross; forced James, new earl of Douglas, to submit, his brothers being defeated at Arkinholm, 1455; attained the Douglases, 1455; annexed the Douglas, Crawford, and other estates to the crown, 1455; proposed joint action with France against England; ravaged Northumberland, 1456, but concluded a two years' truce with Henry VI, afterwards prolonged, 1457; pacified the highlands; strengthened the crown by marriages of his sisters with a Gordon and a Douglas, 1458; appointed supreme central court to meet at Edinburgh, Perth, and Aberdeen, and established annual circuits of the judiciary court in his parliament of 1458, the burgh courts also being reformed in the interests of the people, and the coinage re-established; favoured the Lancastrians, and received Queen Margaret and her son after the battle of Northampton, 1460; killed by accident while besieging Roxburgh Castle; buried at Holyrood. [xxix. 136]

JAMES III (1451-1488), king of Scotland; son of James II [q. v.]; crowned at Kelso, 1460; during his minority Henry VI received, Berwick acquired, and truce with England prolonged; his person seized by Sir Alexander Boyd, 1466; his marriage with Margaret of Denmark, and the cession of Orkney and Shetland, arranged, 1468-9; threw off the Boyds and assumed power, 1469; reduced the highlands by submission of Ross, 1476, and procured archiepiscopal pall for Scotland; alienated the nobles by partiality to favourites; attacked by an English army, Albany, his own brother, being in the English camp, 1482, when his forces mutinied, hanged the favourite, Robert Cochrane [q. v.], and imprisoned him in Edinburgh Castle, Berwick being finally retaken by the English, 1482; reconciled with Albany, who, however, continued his intrigues with England till driven abroad after the unsuccessful raid of Lochmaben, where Douglas was captured, 1484; was attacked anew owing to his extravagance and choice of fresh favourites by the lowland nobles, including Angus, Gray, and Hume, who put the king's eldest son at their head; was defeated at Sauchieburn and murdered; buried at Cambuskenneth. His portrait is in the altar-piece at Holyrood. [xxix. 141]

JAMES IV (1473-1513), king of Scotland: son of James III [q. v.]; crowned at Scone, 1488; did penance for his father's death, but revoked grants made by him; crushed the rebellion of Lennox, Lyle, and Forbes, 1489; provided for defence of the east coast against English pirates and fostered the navy; passed acts for musters of the forces in each shire and legal reforms, 1491; visited the western isles, 1493-5, and began his pilgrimages to Whithorn and St. Duthac's; received Perkin Warbeck [q. v.] and married him to Lady Katherine Gordon, 1495; made border raids in Warbeck's favour, 1496-7, but carried on negotiations with the Spanish and French, who endeavoured to detach him from Warbeck; having made a truce for seven years with England and strengthened his hold over the west, agreed to treaty of marriage with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII., in 1502; married Margaret, 1503; crushed rising of Donald Dubh in the west; introduced royal law into the isles; instituted a daily council to hear civil cases at Edinburgh, conferred burgh privileges, secured fixity of tenure by the 'fe' statutes, and revoked acts prejudicial to crown and church, 1504; assisted Denmark against the Swedes and Hanse league, 1507 and 1508; sent embassy to Venice, 1508; favoured English alliance while Henry VII. lived, in spite of the national opposition; was asked to enter the league of Cambrai and consulted as to the marriage of Louis XII of France, 1508; sided with Louis XII against the Holy league, 1511; signed treaty with France, 1512, and sent fleet to help Louis against Henry VIII.; invaded Northumberland with a large force; took Norham and smaller castles, but was outgeneralled by Surrey and defeated and slain at Flodden with the flower of his nation, 1513; left several natural children. He was a wise legislator and a good diplomatist. He encouraged education, patronised men of letters, and dabbled in astrology and surgery. [xxix. 145]

JAMES V (1512-1542), king of Scotland; son of James IV [q. v.]; taken by his mother to Stirling, but brought to Edinburgh after her surrender to the regent Albany, 1516; educated by Gavin Dunbar (d. 1547) [q. v.], John Bellenden [q. v.], David Lindsay [q. v.], and James Inglis [q. v.]; carried off to Edinburgh by the queen-mother and the English party, 1524, and proclaimed competent to rule, 1524; under control of Angus, 1525-8; prompted by James Beaton (d. 1539) [q. v.], escaped from Falkland, caused parliament to forfeit the Douglas estates, captured Tantallon and compelled Angus to fly to England, 1528; pacified western isles; aided by clergy and Commons crushed power of nobles; established college of justice, 1532; carried on border raids till peace of 1534; was offered choice of German and French princesses for his wife; received cap and sword of most favoured son of the church and title of 'defender of the faith' from Paul III, 1537; married Madeleine, daughter of Francis I, in France, 1537; on the death of Madeleine married Mary of Guise, 1538, having meanwhile executed conspirators of the Angus family; persecuted heretics, but forced some reforms on the church, and inspired Buchanan's works against the friars; refused to follow English advice to support the Reformation; accompanied the fleet, which extorted submission of western isles, 1540; annexed to the crown all the isles, and the lands of the Douglases, Crawfordes, and other nobles; refused Henry VIII's demand for a conference, 1541, and, after forbidding the discontented barons to cross the borders, collected a force on the west marches; placed Oliver Sinclair in command instead of Lorn Maxwell, the warden; on hearing of the rout at Solway Moss, 1542, died at Falkland; buried at Holyrood; was succeeded by Mary Queen of Scots, his only legitimate daughter. Among his natural children were the regent Moray and the father of Francis Stewart Hepburn, fifth earl of Bothwell [q. v.]; their legitimization by the pope precipitated the Reformation. His popularity with the people earned him the name of 'king of the commons.' [xxix. 153]

JAMES VI, king of Scotland, afterwards JAMES I, king of England (1566-1625); son of Mary Queen of Scots, and Henry Stewart, lord Darnley [q. v.]; crowned on his mother's abdication, 1567; entrusted to Mar and afterwards to Sir Alexander Erskine; well educated under George Buchanan (1566-1582) [q. v.]; nominally king on first fall of Morton, 1578; under influence of Lennox (Esmé Stuart) sanctioned Morton's execution, 1581; seized by protestant nobles at the Raid of Ruthven, 1582, and compelled to proscribe Lennox and Arran, to reverse their policy, and to submit to the clergy; escaped from Falkland to St. Andrews, and took refuge with Argyll and Huntly, 1583; recalled Arran, imprisoned Andrew Melville [q. v.], and drove the protestant lords into England; made overtures to the Guises and the pope, 1584; allowed Arran to procure Gowrie's execution and obtain control of the government; forced by his concern for protestantism and return of the banished raiders to conclude treaty of Berwick (1586) with England, receiving pension from Elizabeth; made formal protests and intercessions for his mother, but was incensed at being disinherited by her in favour of Philip II; quickly reconciled himself to his mother's execution in February 1587; married Anne of Denmark in Norway, 1589; consented to act annulling jurisdiction of the bishops, 1592; intrigued with Spain and Parma; appointed the Octavians to improve the revenue (1596); provoked clergy by recalling northern earls from exile, 1596; made proclamation for removal of the courts of justice, after tumult in Edinburgh caused by his expulsion of discontented presbyterians, 1596; at the general assemblies of Perth and Dundee (1597) obtained limitation of clerical interference, but agreed to confer with clerical commissioners on church affairs; his proposals for the appointment of parliamentary representatives rejected by further conferences, three bishops only being appointed to seats (1600); his relations with the clergy again embittered after failure of the Gowrie conspiracy, 1600; before his accession to the English throne (1603) engaged in further intrigues with Rome and secret correspondence with Robert Cecil and others; after accession made peace with Spain, 1604, and dismissed and imprisoned Raleigh; called the Hampton Court conference for discussion of puritan objections to the liturgy, 1604; issued proclamation (1604) banishing Romanist priests; after the Gunpowder plot sanctioned a severe recusancy act (1606), but modified it in favour of Romanists who rejected papal power of deposition, 1606; thwarted by parliament in his scheme of a union of Great Britain, but obtained from the judges a decision in favour of the post-nati, 1608; made defensive league with Dutch republic, 1608; joined France in negotiating truce between it and Spain, 1609; attempted to secure peace by alliance with catholic powers, 1609; carried on controversy with Bellarmine on the papal power; ordered cessation of common law 'prohibitions' against ecclesiastical courts, 1609; obtained decision (1606) in favour of the right to levy 'impositions,' but agreed to abandon the heaviest of them, 1610; dissolved his first parliament after failure of negotiations concerning the great contract, 1611; treated with Spain and Tuscany for the marriage of his eldest son, but betrothed the Princess Elizabeth to the leader of the German protestants, making defensive treaty with the protestant union, 1611; obtained introduction of episcopacy into Scotland, 1610; favoured plantation of Ulster with English and Scotsmen; instituted order of baronets, 1611; dissolved second parliament almost immediately, 1614, imprisoning four members; obtained a benevolence; consulted the judges separately on Peacham's case, 1615; had to submit to condemnation of his favourite Somerset (Robert Carr), 1616; renewed negotiations with Spain, 1617; reduced independence of Scottish clergy by appointment of bishops as 'constant moderators' and raising of stipends conditionally on their acceptance of Articles of Perth (1618); executed Raleigh to please Spain, 1618; refused to support ambitious schemes of his son-in-law Frederick, the elector palatine, 1619; on advice of Buckingham agreed to redress grievances complained of in his third parliament, and consented to Bacon's condemnation (1621), but held his own in case of Edward Floyd [q. v.]; dissolved parliament and punished leading members, 1622; continued negotiations with Spain, agreeing to relieve the English Catholics, 1623, but on the failure of Charles's and Buckingham's mission to Spain was compelled by them to break off the marriage treaty, allow impeachment of Middlesex and Bristol, 1624, and consent to a French marriage, with a provision for religious liberty of the Catholics, 1624; failed in attempts on behalf of the Palatinate; buried in Westminster Abbey. Conciliation was the keynote of James I's policy. His chief works were 'Basiliicon Doron' (1599), 'True Law of Free Monarchies' (1603), and 'Apology for the Oath of Allegiance' (1607). Collected works published, 1816. Portraits of him are in the National Portrait Gallery. [xxix. 161]

JAMES II (1633-1701), king of England; second son of Charles I; created Duke of York; handed over to parliament after the surrender of Oxford, 1646; escaped to Holland, 1648; went to Paris, 1649; left Paris for Holland, 1650; after battle of Worcester (1651) entered French service as a volunteer, and distinguished himself under Turenne against the Fronde and its allies, 1652-5; took service with the Spanish in Flanders, 1657; in command of Nieupoort at Cromwell's death, 1658; secretly contracted himself to Anne Hyde [q. v.] at Breda, 1659; created first high admiral, 1660; received revenues of the post-office, 1663; dissuaded disbandment of the troops after Venner's rising, 1661; as head of the admiralty reconstituted the board, and issued 'Instructions,' 1662, which remained in force till beginning of nineteenth century, and memoirs of naval affairs, 1660-73; governor of the Royal Africa Company, c. 1664; received patent of New York (New Amsterdam), 1664; commanded fleet in first Dutch war, winning battle of Solebay, 1665, but failed to complete the victory; defended Olerendon in House of Lords; estranged from Charles II, but early entered into his French policy; probably became Roman Catholic soon after treaty of Dover (1670); won victory of Southwold Bay over De Ruyter, 1672; ceased to be high admiral after passing of the Test Act, 1673; his second marriage (1673) with Mary Beatrix of Modena (a Catholic) censured by House of Commons; became increasingly unpopular after discovery of the correspondence with Père La Chaise; at Charles II's request, withdrew to the Hague, and afterwards to Brussels, 1679, the first Exclusion Bill being introduced in his absence; recalled on the king's illness, and afterwards sent to Scotland as high commissioner, 1679; returned, 1680; again forced to retire after a few months, another Exclusion Bill being subsequently passed by the Commons, 1680, who, in spite of its rejection by the Lords, adhered to the plan, 1681; his religious policy in Scotland at first conciliatory, but afterwards more severe; his return to London effected by influence of the Duchess of Portsmouth, 1682; readmitted to the council; regained his powers at the admiralty (1684), and witnessed Charles's deathbed conversion; ascended the throne on his brother's death, 6 Feb. 1685; during first year of his reign (1685) openly professed Catholicism; appointed the Anglican Rochester lord treasurer, and banished Duchess of Portsmouth, 1685; levied customs duties on his own authority; lost his pension from Louis XIV by summoning a parliament and maintaining good relations with William of Orange, 1685; refused to pardon Monmouth after Sedgemoor (July 1685); rewarded Jeffreys for the Bloody Assize (August 1685) with the chief-justiceship; dismissed Halifax, October 1685; with the help of Sunderland, Petre, and Talbot (Tyrconnel) remodelled the army; made changes on the bench to insure a decision in favour of the dispensing power, 1686; revived the high commission, 1686; dismissed Rochester and Olerendon, 1687; made Roman Catholics officers and justices of the peace; his first declaration of indulgence (preceded by a similar proclamation in Scotland) issued 4 April 1687; publicly received the papal nuncio, 8 July 1687; dissolved parliament, 4 July 1687; by personal influence forced Catholics on Magdalen College, Oxford, 1688; ordered the second declaration to be read in churches (May 1688), the seven bishops petitioning against it being tried for seditious libel, but acquitted (30 June 1688); ordered recall of the six English regiments in the Dutch service (January 1688); accepted money from Louis XIV for equipment of a fleet, April 1688; declined French ships and offer of a joint declaration of war against Holland, September 1688; brought over soldiers from Ireland, and (September 1688) recalled the parliamentary writ; circulated general pardon on same day as William of Orange's declaration (29 Sept. 1688); restored Bishop Compton, the Protestant fellows, and the charter of London; made formal declaration as to the genuine birth of his son, October 1688; dismissed Sunderland, 1688; augmented the army and navy; marched to Salisbury, but after desertion of his adherents returned to London, 1688; issued writs for a parliament, 1688; named commissioners to meet William, but after the Hungerford conference secretly left London (11 Dec.), embarked at Sheerness, was brought back to Faversham, and finally escaped with Berwick to France (22-25 Dec. 1688); established by Louis at St. Germain; made unsuccessful appeals for help to various powers; landed in Ireland with French force, 1689; held a parliament in Dublin (May 1689), which passed a toleration act, transferred tithes to Roman Catholics, and repealed the act of settlement; joined his army and was present at the Boyne, 1690, after which he left Ireland; corresponded with Marlborough and others from St. Germain; witnessed defeat of expedition off Cape La Hogue, 1692, and with Berwick prepared another invasion, 1695; rejected proposal of Louis XIV for succession of his son after death of William III, and after peace of Ryswick (1697) devoted himself to religious exercises; died at St. Germain, having received from Louis a promise to recognise his son's title. His remains were re-interred at St. Germain in 1824. The manuscript of his 'Original Memoirs' was destroyed during the French revolution. By Arabella Churchill he had four natural children and a daughter by Catharine Sedley, besides issue by both his wives. His talent for business was spoiled by religious and political bigotry. Kneller painted his portrait (National Portrait Gallery). [xxix. 181]
